REMPART is a recognized public-interest association.

Popular education for citizenship

No one is born a citizen. Citizenship is something to be earned and to be practised. Becoming a citizen means being dynamic, committed, taking responsibility. This is what REMPART proposes through a lifelong informal educational approach.

The volunteer workcamps are a unique way to learn to live together. Thanks to their social, cultural and intergenerational diversity, they help people to learn to get on and work together.

By supporting REMPART workcamps, you take an active step in helping young people to become genuine citizens.

Passing on skills

Working on old buildings means using traditional skills such as stone masonry, lime mortar work, carpentry and even blacksmithing. There are facilitators on hand passing on their experience and helping the participants to discover the materials, tools and turns of hand which are in danger of being forgotten.

By supporting REMPART, you can make all the difference in promoting manual skills and valuable intangible heritage.

Expertise and international solidarity

Commitment to heritage is what REMPART is all about. This means engaging in international projects in partnership with civil society organisations. This in turn promotes world-wide mobility, solidarity with associations the world over and fosters emblematic restoration initiatives.

Working with us in China, the Comoros or Romania means training partners, sharing expertise, delegating technicians, facilitators and teams of volunteers, buying supplies...

Inclusion and the social ties

Making heritage accessible to all is an explicit policy which RAMPART puts into action all over France, in relation with local initiatives, second-chance schools, clubs for the prevention of drug abuse, and medico-educational institutions.

Help REMPART to raise awareness for heritage and the skills it implies, in particular among drop outs from school or job-seekers. Help them find their way back into society by learning how to be mobile and self-sufficient.
